Commentary

May was a subdued month for the AIM Index with returns of -2.2% whilst the Equilibrium AIM Portfolio returned 0.2%.

The first stages of the lifting of lockdown restrictions commenced in May and companies immediately responded by re-opening for business, such as pub chain Young & Co. which opened 144 pubs that were able to offer outside catering and Jet2 who put on extra capacity to 'green list' countries as demand sky-rocketed.

Other companies also reported a general improvement in outlook as trading broadly resumes. In May, Gamma Communications reported that profits for the full year are expected to be, "at the higher end of the range of market research", and Midwich Group reported that, "revenue and profit for the full year will be comfortably ahead of its original expectations".

Even companies operating in relatively stable markets, such as kettle component manufacturer Strix, are seeing good growth opportunities as they outlined in the recent AGM statement, "we anticipate delivering revenue growth of c. 30% for the Group during 2021 which also underpins our confidence in achieving our medium-term target to double the Group's revenues over the next five years".

Encouragingly, many of the companies that have reported recently have also signalled their intention to resume dividends over the coming quarters.

There is a collective hope that the way is clear for full release from lockdown on the 21st of this month and this should pave the way for positive momentum in company trading.
